A maidenhead. TOM BROWN being at an assembly, was asked how he liked a young "lady that was dancing? and whose complexion was discernably her own manufacture? Really, sir, answered he, I am no connoisseur in painting. A young lady, who had been married about six months, asked Tom Brown if he would stand for her first child? Madam, answered he, by the shortness of, your apron, I am very sure your first child has already been stood for. One of the Canons of St. Paul's being in company with some ladies, let fall his handkerchief, and in stooping to pick it up again, he happened[^] to break wind backwards. Bless me, ladies! cried out one of them, I believe 'tis his Majesty's birthday, for I think I hear one of the cannons at St. James's. No, madam, answered another lady, then present, I am sure 'tis not so far off as St. James's, for I can smell the gunpowder. A2 Tom Brown, being in company with one Mr. Wake, and another gentleman, it happened that the former fell asleep; which the other gentleman observing, said, why, Tom, our friend is asleep. I'll lay you a guinea, cries Tom, that he is a Wake. Done, cries the other. Well now, says Tom, I'll convince you that I have won the wager:—Don't you know, that his grandfather was a Wake, and his father was a Wake? and certainly he must be a Wake, even though he is fast asleep: therefore I have won the wager
